Lewis & Clark Law School 2011, 359 pages

In 1965, an eighty-year-old law school joined a century-old liberal arts college and together set upon a voyage in world turbulent times to reach acceptance in the American family of accredited law education. This is the story of the decade that followed – a long journey told as a memoir by its oldest wayfarer. The course wended its way through the forest beyond the classroom and the cloister, all the while erecting a school and schooling within. In that trek, the reader is given insight into the standards to which law educators are put and by which lawyers are formed.
