MESSAGE FROM LEADERSHIP

We fight every day for justice. But what does it take to achieve justice? A critical piece is ensuring that victims have meaningful rights to privacy, protection, full restitution, and participation. Only with these rights can victims become survivors. During 2013-2014 we asked that the community join us in this fight so that together we could become “a million rising for victims’ rights.” Wonderfully, individuals and organizations from across the country and around the globe heeded the call. Together we are creating change. Join us as we reflect on the successes of the year and plan for the future: a future in which we will solve the justice equation.

“The presentation gave me a different perspective of what victims may be thinking, and what I can change in my every day job.”

Police Officer

“Even though I do this work regularly, there is always something I learn from NCVLI’s presentations. All have been clear, concise, organized and knowledgeable.”

Attorney

“The training was great to get folks in the legal field more involved in this growing area of the law.”

Attorney

“It was a fantastic experience. It was one of the best trainings I’ve ever attended. I learned so much that I can take into court with me as an advocate.”

MEANINGFUL RIGHTS FOR SURVIVORS

One victory at a time, we are creating change.

Survivor
A person who endures adversity, moves through it, and perseveres; a person with resiliency who remains undefeated.

Systems begin to change as NCVLI’s model of lawyers for victims is implemented by every branch of the military.

Recognizing the impact of crime and victims’ rights, a court awards full restitution, including future lost income and medical costs.

A sexual assault victim’s privacy and protection rights support denying defense motion for a psychological exam.

A victim is able to proceed by pseudonym, which ensures victim participation in justice.

Victim voice is heard when the U.S. Supreme Court hears from a victim’s attorney on equal footing with the prosecution and defense in a criminal case.

NCVLI is recognized with the Mary Byron Celebrating Solutions Award for its innovative work.
