Course Description Broadly, this course interrogates animal law developments within and among states. Close attention is paid to the historical contexts, legal principles, economic calculations, cultural paradigms, health and environmental considerations, and moral concerns that inform how states and international organizations seek to regulate animals' interests in the present day. Against this backdrop, students will scrutinize past, present, and proposed treaties and declarations, as well as other legal instruments that seek to advance the interests of animals. In doing so, students will be encouraged to consider pragmatic approaches to realizing more robust animal protections around the world.
